

To increase the effective volume of the ARIANNA detector, one method is to lower the trigger threshold and collect more data, but in the most remote locations in Antarctica, data transmission speed is limited. This paper demonstrates that deep learning techniques can be implemented in the current ARIANNA data acquisition system to reject thermal noise in real time, which will increase the detector's sensitivity to neutrino signals.